A BLAST search has four components: query, database, program, and search purpose/goal. To discuss effective BLAST program selection, we first need to know what databases are available and what sequences these databases contain. In this section, we will first take a look at the common BLAST databases.

NCBI produced the first version of BLAST around 1990, accompanied by the publication of the first BLAST paper by Altschul et al. . This version performed only gap-free alignments, but provided p-values that allowed users to judge the statistical significance of their result. A gapped version of BLAST appeared in 1997 . This release also included PSI-BLAST, which could produce a PSSM and then search the database with it.
